

- The electron affinity is negative if energy is released upon addition of an electron. If it is positive, the resultant anion is unstable. Explain why beryllium has a positive electron affinity, while that of fluorine is highly negative.

Why is the ionisation potential of oxygen slightly smaller than nitrogen, despite being further across the period?

How is this related to the slightly positive electron affinity of nitrogen?