

- Copper is an essential element in human biology, deficiencies leading to blood disorders. Excess copper can occur in cases of poisoning or in Wilson's disease. Draw a graph showing the relationship between overall health and the level of copper in the body and identify the 'healthy' range.

4

Describe one biological function of copper.

Blank space for describing a biological function of copper.

Suggest one approach for treating an excess level of copper.

Blank space for suggesting an approach for treating an excess level of copper.